

Bloggers are the new sexy

At least according to People's '50 Hottest Bachelors'

PEOPLE MAGAZINE, always the purveyor of sexiness, has recently published their list of the "50 Hottest Bachelors."

Among the chosen few? Tom Cruise, Matthew McConaughey, Brad Pitt, and New Yorker Jason Mulgrew.

You might wonder "which one of these names doesn't belong here?" So does Mulgrew.

"I initially thought it was '50 Most Eligible Bachelors' and that made sense, because I'm nothing if not 'eligible,' as in, women want very little to do with me. But '50 Hottest'? I have no idea.

Typing to hotness

So what is it that makes Mulgrew so sexy? Does he devote his life to being an actor, race car driver, fireman or another profession that gets the ladies on their backs in no time flat? Not quite.

Mulgrew earned his hot, eligible status by sitting in front of a computer and chronicling his single-life adventures, which include: drunken nights out, being "husky," STDs, strippers, attempting to workout, smoking pot with a wedding photographer and hooking up on the first date. These missives are collected on jasonmulgrew.com.

From the beginning

Since blogging has not always been equated with

BLOGGER JASON MULGREW was named one of People magazin

"sexiness" or even "kinda hotness," how did this all happen?

Originally, Mulgrew wanted to do stand-up, but was too scared and lazy to accomplish the "stand" and the "up" part at the same time, so he put material down on his own Web site. He e-mailed it out to a few friends and it just grew from there.

"When I started this, 20 people a day were reading it. I had to explain the word 'blog' to my friends." Now his site garners more hits than Leonardo DiCaprio at a Rick Solomon party — over 10,000 readers a day.

These are his confessions

A writer and an editor at People contacted him, claiming they were fans and got him in the mag's pages — right next to Usher. Although he
